"RAMONA" THRILLS NOT INVENTIONS.

Resort to the ordinary kind of red fire and breath taking stunts of the "movie stunts" were not necessary to put thrill into "H. Clunes' cinema operatic spectacle, "Ramona," which will be the first time here at the Grand for a four-day engagement, September 23.

The original plot of the ancient story of Helen Hunt Jackson novel, of which "Ramona" is a dramatization, is made up of a succession of swift moving scenes that comprise a veritable "billboard of dramatic clashes, and Director Donald Crisp, whose experience in producing "The Birth of a Nation" taught him value of "punch" in big scenes, found all of this much-sought element that could be desired in the actual text.

Readers of the book will recall with tingling nerves the tragic sacking of the Indian village Temecula; the panic and stampede of the Indians; their frenzy as they applied torches to the home from which they were being driven by the whites; the arrival of Alessandro in the heat of the conflict, the death of his father, the great Chief Pablo Assis; the brutal rounding up by the whites of the Indian men, women and children like cattle. All are portrayed in the screen spectacle with a realism that holds an audience spellbound.

The force of these scenes does not lie in their "punch" alone. A large part comes from the absolute humanity of the occurrences, for the pictures are a literal transcript of history. Everything they depict has taken place within a day's railroad journey of Los Angeles, and in it all epitomized a century's pollution, cruelty and spoliation by the white man in his dealings with his red brother.

In some of the "big scenes" in motion picture plays, you find that they are "stunts" or "tricks" for their effect. Not so in this case. The hand of time seems to have been turned back to those who have read "Ramona" and know its history. You seem to be witnessing one of the great tragedies of human chronicles. In contrast with these scenes, the framed-up thrill material of the scenario writer's imagination seems cheap, theatrical and insincere.
